Case No. 3:17-cv-00939-WHA

DEFENDANTS' OPPOSITION TO WAYMO'S MOTION IN LIMINE NO.
13 TO EXCLUDE ALLEGATIONS
THAT DAVID DRUMMOND ACTED
IMPROPERLY

Judge: The Honorable William Alsup
Trial Date: October 10, 2017

UNREDACTED VERSION OF DOCUMENT SOUGHT TO BE SEALED

Waymo does not challenge the admissibility of evidence that (1) Google joined Uber's Board of Directors without informing Uber that it had already decided to enter the transportation as-a-service ("TaaS") market; (2) Uber learned of Google's advancements in TaaS from public sources rather than Google; and (3) each time Uber asked about Google's plans to compete with Uber, Google failed to give a straight answer, deferring on the grounds that "competition is a long way off" and the companies should "continue to work on [their] partnership." Goodman Decl., Ex. 53 (Drummond Dep.) at 24:23-25:7.) All the while Google knew that it did not plan to partner with Uber and was already strategizing about [REDACTED]

Instead of challenging the admissibility of this evidence, Waymo only seeks to preclude Uber from suggesting that Google acted improperly. (Mot. at 1.) There is ample evidence for Uber to argue to the jury, and for the jury to conclude, that Waymo acted in bad faith by misleading Uber about its plans, including when directly asked by Uber, and that its motives for doing so were to gain a competitive advantage over a company it secretly viewed as its main rival. This evidence is relevant to Waymo's motives for bringing this case and thus relevant to both Waymo's claims and Uber's defenses. (See Defendants' Opp. to Mot. In Limine 15; Defendants' Opp. to Waymo's Mot. for Partial Summary Judgment.)

ARGUMENT

No later than February 2013, Google decided that the best way to commercialize its autonomous vehicle program was to enter the TaaS market. Goodman Decl., Ex. 54 (Epstein Dep.) at 31:15-36:3.) But Google did not disclose this strategy to Uber when it made a substantial investment in Uber in 2013, nor when, as a result of that investment, it placed its Chief Legal Officer, David Drummond, on Uber's Board of Directors. Instead, Uber first learned about Google's plans when Google co-founder Sergey Brin publicly suggested the possibility in May 2014 at a tech conference. (Id., Ex. 53 at 17:14-20:7.) When confronted by Uber's then-CEO Travis Kalanick, Drummond told him not to worry, that "we were still deciding what we were going to do" and "any competition was a long ways off, and we had a good partnership, we should continue it." Id.

1 Despite Drummond's assurances to the contrary, Google continued making advances
 2 toward launching a competing TaaS platform. For example, on January 15, 2015, Kalanick
 3 emailed Drummond after learning that the head of Google's [REDACTED]
 4 [REDACTED] at the Detroit Auto
 5 Show. (Goodman Decl., Ex. 45.) A few months later, Kalanick learned, again from third parties,
 6 that Google was [REDACTED] (Id.,
 7 Ex. 33.) Again, Drummond assured Kalanick that "competition would be a long ways off and we
 8 should continue to work on our partnership." (Id., Ex. 53 at 22:2-24:7.) By this time, however,
 9 Google had already decided internally not to partner with Uber and instead compete with it. (Id.,
 10 Ex. 31, Ex. 32.) In fact, at the same time these statements were made, Google was performing an 11 internal analysis of [REDACTED] (Id.,
 12 Ex. 47.)

13 Even when Drummond eventually resigned from Uber's Board, he was not fully candid.
 14 He never told Uber about Google's concerns about potential misconduct on the part of 15 Levandowski and other Otto employees even though he was simultaneously ordering Google's 16 investigative team to redouble their investigative efforts, wholly motivated by the merger between
 17 Otto and Uber. (Id., Ex. 41, Ex. 53 at 54:9-57:24.)

18 In trade secret cases, a plaintiff's motivation for filing suit is relevant and admissible to 19 witness credibility, a plaintiff's bad faith, damages, and several defenses. See Defendants' Opp.
 20 to Mot. In Limine 15 (citing caselaw). And Judge Corley already held Waymo's motives are 21 relevant. Dkt. 832 at 4. Google's course of conduct while occupying a seat on Uber's Board, and
 22 its deliberate withholding of information from Uber in particular, is relevant to the jury's
 23 evaluation of Google's motivation for filing suit and the credibility of its witnesses. Waymo's
 24 motion entirely fails to address this aspect of its relevance, which courts in the Ninth Circuit have 25 held outweighs any prejudice that might accompany such evidence in trade secrets cases.
 26 (Defendants' Opp. to Mot. In Limine No. 15.) Google's conduct is also relevant to Defendants'
 27 failure to mitigate damages defenses, which are premised in part on the failure to timely inform 28 Uber of Google's concerns about Levandowski's conduct or seek judicial intervention.

1 (Defendants' Opp. to Waymo's Mot. for Partial Summ. J. at 15-17.) Google's conduct towards
2 Uber during Drummond's Board tenure is relevant to the credibility of Waymo's ex post
3 justifications for both its failure to inform Uber and its delay in filing suit.

4 Waymo's arguments under Rule 403 are also wrong. For example, Waymo's first Rule
5 403 argument is that whether Google acted "improperly" is "irrelevant" and "untrue." The 6 relevance and supporting evidence is discussed at length above and Google is free to challenge
7 Uber's evidence and argument with its own witnesses and evidence. When it comes to prejudice,
8 Waymo claims that such evidence and argument would "sully[] Mr. Drummond, Waymo, and 9 Alphabet." (Mot. at 4.) As to "sully," all evidence that is unfavorable for a party tends to 10 prejudice it to some extent. E.g., U.S. v. Blitz, 151 F.3d 1002, 1008 (9th Cir. 1998). To be
11 excluded under Rule 403, however, the prejudice must both be "unfair" and substantially
12 outweigh its probative value. Waymo has not demonstrated how evidence that Google withheld
13 information from Uber while occupying a seat on its Board is "unfairly prejudicial." Just because 14 evidence "hurts Waymo" is not "a good enough reason to exclude it." 7/26 Hr'g Tr. at 61:12-14.

15 Waymo also suggests that argument about Drummond's Board tenure would "confuse"
16 the jury, citing Nationwide Trans. Finance v. Cass Info. Sys., Inc., 523 F.3d 1051, 1063 (9th Cir.
17 2008). But in Nationwide, the Ninth Circuit affirmed a district court ruling that a party cannot
18 present evidence about an agency theory of liability where the district court held that no agency
19 relationship existed. Presenting the jury with an invalid theory of liability could have confused
20 the jury about the bases on which it could find liability. Id. Here, Uber has asserted no claims
21 and it will not argue that Drummond or Google has any type of liability to Uber. The jury will 22 not be confused that this evidence relates to some undisclosed claim against Drummond. To the 23 contrary, they will wonder, like any other objective observer, why Drummond, then an Uber
24 Board member, did not pick up the phone and call Kalanick to warn him that Uber had just 25 entered into a merger agreement with a company whose employees Google was investigating for 26 possible employment agreement breaches and trade secret misappropriation. These deficiencies
27 in Waymo's story are directly relevant to its claims and Uber's defenses.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, Waymo's Motion In Limine 13 should be denied.
